Kagewani X is a game about executing game addiction. It is a time-manipulating action game where you can execute people to cure them of their addiction to video games, and with enough time the people will return to life. With each execution you will obtain more time to execute people, and so on... Will you be the executioner to save people from their video game addiction? Gameplay: Kagewani X is a single player time-manipulating action game where you can execute people to cure them of their video game addiction and with enough time the people will return to life. The game has a time-manipulating system where after every kill and healing you can either do more kills and healings to advance the time or simply do nothing and wait for time to advance by itself. Your goal is to use as much time as possible to execute as many people as possible. You will be executing people to cure them of their addiction to video games, which is represented by little blue characters called "Tentacles". These tentacles can be killed or healed to extend the healing duration. If you find a person without any tentacles then you can also execute them for fun. Every execution resets the time and it will be back to 0.0 after some time. Healings will restore your health, while killing a person will reset the time back to 0.0 and the person will turn blue. The game will end after a player completes all the people on the stage, or after a large amount of time has passed. The game will show a score for every executed person which is based on their life percentage and their current health. You can also view the game stats in the options. Kagewani X is a frantic action game that requires you to carefully choose your execution skills and timing in order to survive long enough to execute your next target. How to play: Instructions: Kagewani X is about time management and execution skills. Use the X button to execute people and W to heal yourself. You can kill the people with the touch of tentacles on them or simply shoot them with your gun. You can do one or multiple executions depending on how much time you have. Can you execute all the people on the stage? Find out in this Action game. c9d1549cdd

What's new:

The iridescent surfaces of many types of fish and other creatures, like the peacock's tail, are known as iridescence. This visual property is due to the presence of a highly ordered and randomly orientated array of microscopic structures, known as the iridescent film. Iridescence can also occur due to the presence of particulate reflections on a single plane. The reflection from the oscillating particles causes the light to be reflected at many different wavelengths. This color pattern is known as interference coloration or rainbow coloration. The reflection is classified as either being partly to fully broadband according to the wavelengths that are of high importance. The iridescent colors of many animals is often thought to be for the purpose of aposematism or crypsis—potent signals used by prey to avoid or detect predators. These effects are known as iridescence to mimic colors on a light background that might be associated with a deadly predator. Study of organisms' iridescent phenotypes can offer clues into the function and evolution of these colors. Background "Iridia" is the Latin word for "rainbow" referring to the colours of rainbow spectra that appear when light is reflected from transparent iridescent surfaces such as peacock feathers. The word has come to be used for the entire group of animals that display this behavior, for example, many fish like the zebra perch, butterfly fish, gobies, chameleon fish, shy reticulated barbels, etc.. To date, several theories have been put forward to explain the function of iridescence but have still not been unequivocally accepted by researchers. Almost all ideas revolve around the concealment of the true color being used by the fish, usually black, by use of color deception. Mammalian coat iridescence In mammals of the coat, iridescence occurs as a result of the presence of small structures known as crystals that are hydrated, suspended in the skin, and located in small pits on the epidermal surfaces of vibrissal (whisker) hairs. These pits are located both above and below the follicle and contain the stalks that emerge from the follicle below the pits. When these points contact the water, the hair expands and reduces the spacing between the points. This wavelength-dependent expansion of the pre-follicular points results in the observed rainbow pattern. The beauty of the mammalian coat is
