On Tuesday, the British parliament passed the Carer's Allowance (Dependent Person's Payment) Act, which will provide benefits to about 17,000 carers around the country. And, as a supplementary measure, an extra 1.1 million people will qualify for the minimum wage. This should go some way to redress the balance, although the Tories are pushing through cuts to local councils at the same time, so it could get tougher for carers. The government is also looking at other initiatives that might help, including a Carer's Tax Credit, available to up to £90 a month; and a special carer's tax rate of 20 per cent. The new Carer's Allowance, announced in the budget in July, will be payable to carers up to the age of 64 and for at least 20 hours of care per week and will be available up to a maximum of £89 a week for those caring for an adult with learning disabilities. Working hours can be worked up to a maximum of 34 hours a week. The scheme replaces the Carer's Allowance and the higher rate of benefits available to carers of people with disabilities. It is expected to cost £2.7bn a year and will be funded out of the social care budget. For the first time, people supporting children, as well as carers, are also eligible for the allowance. The new scheme will start from April 2016, although carers of disabled children will not be eligible until April 2017. In recognition of carers' increasing responsibility, the government is calling for employers to continue to recognise the work of carers, including through the introduction of a "carer's premium" - an amount paid above a minimum rate by a company to help cover
