On any given day, a man might have a massive barbecue in his backyard, or fill a bowl with meatballs. A woman might be cleaning a grubby floor, or caressing a polished stove. A teenager might be rifling through a junk drawer, or snapping a high-quality photo of the house he's about to buy. For these and other people, their homes are not merely places to rest, or to sleep or to relax.

Statistical analysis of consecutive cases of epilepsy with and without psychiatric symptoms: a study from two hospitals. To examine clinical features of electroencephalographic (EEG) patterns in different types of epilepsy with and without psychiatric symptoms. Data were collected from consecutive patients with epilepsy with and without psychiatric symptoms presenting to the Department of Neurology, Seoul National University Hospital, and the Department of Neurology, Chung-Ang University Hospital, over the period of 2005-2011. Psychiatric symptoms were diagnosed by experienced psychiatrists, and the probable cause of epilepsy was determined based on the International League Against Epilepsy's "International Classification of Epilepsy and Seizure Disorders" (3rd edition). The analysis was performed using independent t test, χ^2 test, Fisher exact test, and analysis of variance. During the 3-year study period, a total of 2458 patients with epilepsy (age, 44.6 ± 17.1 years) were admitted. Of the patients, 49.2% presented with epilepsy and comorbid psychiatric symptoms, and the proportion of men was higher in patients with epilepsy and comorbid psychiatric symptoms ($P = .004$). The most frequent comorbid psychiatric symptoms were bipolar affective disorder (34.6%), major depressive disorder (28.6%), and generalized anxiety disorder (16.5%). Patients with epilepsy and comorbid psychiatric symptoms were significantly older ($P = .002$) and more frequently men ($P = .013$) than patients with epilepsy without comorbid psychiatric symptoms. Patients with epilepsy and comorbid psychiatric symptoms tended to have a longer duration of illness ($P = .096$), were more often on monotherapy ($P = .008$), and less often used first-generation anti-epileptic drugs (AEDs) ($P = .012$) than patients with epilepsy without comorbid psychiatric symptoms. AEDs that were prescribed at discharge tended to be less effective in patients with epilepsy and comorbid psychiatric symptoms ($P = .032$). Patients with epilepsy with comorbid psychiatric symptoms were more frequently men
