Fluorinated alkanes and epoxides, as well as alkoxy-substituted fluoroalkanes, are widely used as solvent and monomer for the manufacture of polymers. They are used as a major component of antifreeze products and as cleaning solvents, in many different areas including metal cleaning, semiconductor fabrication, water treatment, and a variety of other chemical processing. As described in U.S. Pat. No. 5,198,537, these compounds are manufactured by a variety of methods, for example, by combining acid-catalyzed dehydrofluorination of perfluoroolefins with chlorination of the resulting perfluorohydrochlorofluorocarbons (PFC's) with oxygen. The latter chlorination method provides a combination of the highest selectivity and efficiency, but the process is only operable on a laboratory scale because of its relatively low selectivity. While a variety of improvements have been made to the operation of such a process, such improvements have not provided a means for generating products at a commercial scale with equivalent selectivity and efficiency to the laboratory scale process. An epoxide process is disclosed in U.S. Pat. No. 5,744,633, in which the epoxide is produced by hydrofluorination of fluorinated olefins and alcohols in the presence of hydrogen and a catalyst comprising molybdenum and tungsten at high temperature and high pressure. No specific examples of this process are disclosed. A process that avoids the use of epoxides, however, may offer the advantage of avoiding byproducts that may be difficult to separate from the desired epoxide product.Q: How to know what happened when closing a c# form?
