An attendant leads the patient down a corridor, a few steps to an elevator. The attendant presses the button and the patient is whisked away. Behind the front doors of the hospital is the stylishly decorated waiting room. The waiting room has about twenty hospital beds. On one wall are several television screens. You can watch the news or hear the latest gossip on the various pop stars and politicians. One television screen shows news about the use of methamphetamine as a treatment for Alzheimer's. This new method of treatment is not only expensive, but also causes the patient to suffer from epileptic fits. In the waiting room there are pictures of beautiful women and women with unglamorous facial expressions hung on the wall. A painting shows a noble looking man, sitting in a luxurious office in a business suit. The other wall is covered with posters of political posters bearing the messages "Vote for me!", "He is the best!", "Hand over our money!", etc. There are also photos of politicians there, as well as gifts for donors. There is a small bar in the waiting room, and after a while the intercom is activated.

A young doctor tells the patient to come in. The patient is guided into the examination room. "What's the problem, what are you experiencing?" the doctor asks. "A faint headache and slight nausea," the patient answers. The doctor thinks for a while. "Oh, is the medication of any use?" "No, it has been tried." "All right, well then, let's try a bit of a different medication, if you don't mind." "I am completely in control of my actions. I shall do what I want." "And how do you feel at the moment?" "The last fifteen hours have passed in a flash. The day has been long, but short." "An unexpected
