What's new:

From The Walt Disney Company's playbook, a radioactive alien world or "hollow planet" is turning radioactive. ☐ -- It's been more than 100 years since science fiction introduced hollow planets. In "Alas, Babylon" (1931), a story by science-fiction writer John W. Campbell, a planet that "floats like a bubble," and that once was alive but is now dead and empty is depicted. Believed to be the first scientifically verifiable depiction of a hollow planet, it was believed Campbell took a page from the book of science fiction author Edward Page Mitchell, who had discussed the idea of hollow planets in Chapter 5 of his 1908 novel "The Demolished Man." "He's got the name down to his last three letters, hollow planets. I made a careful note of it. He shouldn't lapse into telling a story about them," Mitchell is described as saying in an original-cast recording of the 1941 radio drama "The Gallery of the Thousand Geniuses," in which Mitchell was portrayed by Edd Byrnes. But couldn't this hollow planet have been created by an alien entity? According to the American Museum of Natural History's "Project Mu" website, a hollow planet is not a created space; it's a self-replicating universe. "If the universe is somehow torn open and seeded by an intelligent species, one self-replicating universe can reproduce itself and grow faster than it shrinks into a black hole," it's described. In "Project Mu," the theory is that the universe was seeded by an extraterrestrial civilization. In October 2016, the project had published an article published in the Journal of Cosmology titled "A Theory of a Hollow Universe: Biological Implications," where an "immense semi-biological organism can follow a simple set of instructions and create a universe filled with stars." On April 12, 2017, NASA's Kepler Spacecraft released the results of a three-and-a-half-year long search for planets that could possibly host life. Among the results was the first confirmed exoplanet with the unlikely name "Kepler-186f," or K-186f. K-186f sits 140 light years from Earth in the constellation Cygnus, the Swan. "The star Kepler-186, which lies 140 light-years away from Earth, has seven Earth-size worlds in orbit around it. They range in temperature from a comfortably
