Entropic origin of the anomalous thermal properties of magnesium oxide nanofluids. A full description of the anomalous thermal properties of nanofluids is a critical issue for practical applications. Here, we utilize molecular dynamics simulations to study nanofluids of magnesium oxide nanoparticles immersed in water at different concentrations, as well as the effect of a magnetic field on the nanofluids. Our simulations predict that nanofluids have a larger viscosity than pure fluids, a much higher thermal conductivity, a remarkably different volumetric thermal diffusivity, and a strikingly different thermal capacity. These observations are based on the anomalous fluid-solid interaction arising from the strong entropic forces in nanofluids and subsequent emergence of a quasi-solid-like behavior. As a result, the thermodynamic quantities predicted by the Rowlinson-Widom model are in good agreement with the simulation results for nanofluids, whereas the predictions from the Stokes-Einstein model, which neglects the entropic interaction, are deviated from the simulation results at high volume fractions. Our findings highlight the importance of the entropic origin of the anomalous thermal properties of nanofluids and may have a significant impact on predicting the thermal behavior of nanofluids.

The Leading Killer of People With Mental Illness is... This is part 2 of a post highlighting the leading killer of people with mental illness. In this post we'll look at the leading killers of people with mood disorders and psychosis. The findings are based on a recent CDC study on the top killers of people in the United States. The CDC data cites the following as the top 10 killers of people in the United States: Suicide Heart disease Cancer Chronic lower respiratory disease (e.g., chronic obstructive pulmonary disease) Kidney disease Accidents (including motor vehicle, gun, and suffocation) Stroke Alzheimer's disease Intentional self-harm (that is, suicide and self-inflicted poisonings) In terms of suicide, 23,744 U.S. residents with a mood disorder, over the age of 12, died by suicide from 2005 to 2007.
