Paying More Money to Get Around Starting out in C++ under C#, I found that this concept of a COM object struggling to create a binding proxy for an interface was rather complex. I even found a C# tutorial to be a little difficult to follow. You see, in.NET you could create a Binding object and provide a proxy implementation, but there were very few reasons that anyone would want to do this. First, you only get a class, not an interface, so there is no way to abstract away the concept of a binding, which is needed for COM. Second, you have to manage COM interfaces manually, you cannot use the.NET Registry to manage them, as they don't have a.NET proxy. What all this is missing, is something where you can create the interface manually, and then have.NET create the proxy for you. Normally the.NET Registry solves all of this. Imagine your typical IDE: you tell it where the COM DLLs are, what the interface does, and the code names of your methods. The IDE will create the necessary registration keys, the proxy types, the implementation class that has the code to call the interface, the DLLs, the registry keys and the checks to make sure the interfaces are actually implemented correctly. I never really thought about it, but it turns out that the same key is used for both registering and unregistering. Registration is used when you ask.NET to install an object 1cb139a0ed
