Sailor Moon Hentai, Fanservice Hentai, Anime.Q: CloudFront (S3) versus CloudDrive for FTP Looking at the features of CloudDrive versus CloudFront for storing files, the only difference seems to be that the former is a P2P approach. For maximum security, I'd like to understand the difference between using a P2P approach versus direct FTP. From my understanding, P2P ensures that the uploaded files reside on every node in the network and each node must do the upload. With FTP, each node does not need to send the file and the only thing that is needed is to know the hostname and port of the other node. I don't think that this is correct. Correct me if I am wrong. A: From your understanding, P2P ensures that the uploaded files reside on every node in the network and each node must do the upload. Cloudfront is a CDN, so the files would remain on one or more servers, but generally only one. All servers receive the upload, and the files are arranged with near-real-time service based on the "most cost-effective" server for your end-user. Not sure how well this works in your case, as you say, but your end-users would not be serving or storing the files. They will be simply pointing to where they live and requesting them. (I know that's not what you wanted to hear.) If you are doing multi-server storage, the files would be stored on the server(s
