What's New In Adobe Photoshop 2021 (Version 22.1.1)?

Gettysburg, Pennsylvania (CNN) The hashtags in this battleground town where history changed forever this week are starting to take on a new meaning: #IfNotNow. In the wake of anti-Trump protesters physically demonstrating on campus -- and even facing aggressive protesters in the streets -- some Trump supporters say the left is getting away with violence and unAmerican behavior. When asked to define what the #IfNotNow hashtags mean, some turned to social media and found comments critical of the media, written by young women, and seemingly about being young, as well as supportive comments about freedom of speech. For some, the choice to attend a "free speech" rally in Washington last weekend was one of the few options of political activism left in the Trump era. And the New York Times reported that the group that organized the National Park Service-approved event said it filled a vital need as a counterpoint to the "darker atmosphere" in some cities. The group -- which was careful to describe the event as "artist" in addition to being a protest -- was billed as a focus on civility during a time when a surprising amount of assaults on Trump supporters have become part of the news. "I think it's disturbing that there's a genuine sense that this is the way that people feel that the world is about to end, that this is the end of this world we live in," said Matt McGregor, who was a Trump delegate to the Republican National Convention and attended the rally. "I think that the elements that have led to this are very real. There are some real dangers in this country for people who happen to think the wrong way. That's not new. That's the way this country has been since its inception. This is not new at all. It's just that now, it's in the mainstream." In the wake of the Charlottesville protests, in which counter-protester Heather Heyer was killed when a neo-Nazi drove his car into a group of counter-protesters, both sides have borne the brunt of public and social media criticism. And with the tragic events that took place in Charlottesville -- where a woman driving a car plowed into a group of anti-racism demonstrators, killing one woman -- it appears the entire nation is feeling less than united. Public perception has shifted on things like hate groups and hate crimes. The right is especially facing its share of criticism, including a new report that indicates 1 in 3 white
