Nanowires as probes of the interior of living cells

(Nanowerk News) Medical nanotechnology promises unprecedented insight into the inner workings of human tissues, and recently, nanoscale sensors have been applied to probe the pathology of the human body. Now, a new class of nanowires has emerged to the forefront as the probes of choice for scientists who are interested in the biochemical and chemical reactions within the cells of living organisms. The research team, led by University of Central Florida physicists and biologists, has developed nanowires composed of the second most common material in the human body - oxygen. Dr. Hui Chen, researcher at UCF's NanoPhotonics Center, used materials science principles to achieve a new class of nanowires that are highly sensitive and selective chemical sensors that are 100 times more sensitive than their predecessors. This new class of nanowires is based on the same technique used to create carbon nanotubes: the gas-phase chemical vapor deposition process. The nanowires are comprised of a single-crystal core made of a high-purity metal oxide and a dielectric shell. The nanowire core functions as a chemical sensor by acting as an electrical conductor, and the surrounding shell functions as a chemical-selective insulator. These characteristics make the nanowire ideal for probing the interior of living cells. In the future, Chen envisions a revolution in the diagnostic field, where nanowires with unique properties could be used to measure or identify a wide range of chemical species, such as toxins, viruses, or drug molecules, directly in the body. The major advantage of nanowires is that they can be engineered to respond to a specific chemical in a body part, such as a cancerous tumor, within seconds or even minutes. "If you are designing a sensor to detect a
