Perinatal outcome and maternal morbidity and mortality after mechanical vs. medical termination of early pregnancy. To determine whether there is a difference in the perinatal outcome in patients undergoing mechanical removal of pregnancy (MROP) as compared with those undergoing medical termination (MTOP). A retrospective analysis of prospectively collected data. Nine maternities of two Medical Universities and two clinical Departments. A total of 425 patients undergoing MROP and 176 patients undergoing MTOP. A comparison of both study groups with respect to mode of conception, fetal status, type of pregnancy, gestational age at abortion, and maternal outcome. Mechanical removal of pregnancy was performed in 58.2% of cases versus 41.8% in the MTOP group. There was no difference in the final gestational age of the fetuses. The frequency of abortion in the MROP group occurred at 7.8 weeks (SD = 4.2) and was significantly earlier than in the MTOP group, where the average time to abortion was 9.6 weeks (SD = 5.4). This difference was mainly due to the fact that the MTOP group had a higher proportion of early abortions (less than 7 weeks) and a lower proportion of late abortions (more than 7 weeks). No difference was seen in the frequency of ectopic pregnancies and multiple pregnancy rates. No difference was found in the incidence of post-abortion complications in the MROP group as compared with the MTOP group. In conclusion, the results of this study do not support the claim that MROP is associated with increased maternal morbidity and mortality. In contrast, the slightly higher risk for spontaneous abortion after MTOP is not justified. Further prospective randomized multicenter studies are needed to further investigate both methods of pregnancy termination. The Amata Stories Are Never Over Let Them Be. That's What They Said. On the last day, no one knew what to say. All of their words were missing. For some of us, it feels like the Amata Stories have come and gone. I knew a little about the Amata Stories when I first started working on this project and I definitely felt a loss when I heard that "they" were done. Although the goal of this project is not to
